as the influx of large franchise retailers, were working to diminish the effectiveness of the traditional “mom and pop” business, even then.

The face of tourism was also changing. Contemporary visitors wanted value-added features. Vacation options were expanding with competitive travel rates and the establishment of large amusement parks, casinos, and other attractions.

The 1990’s marked a new period of infrastructure improvements and new growth. Constant during the town’s 200-plus years, have been its natural beauty and the friendly nature of its inhabitants.

Eventually the Catskill Mountain Railroad would establish a branch running from Catskill Landing west to Cairo. The railroad directors saw the extension as a way to tap business from local fruit growers, bluestone mines, not to mention a growing tourist trade. The line opened in June of 1885 and led to the establishment of much travel-related businesses along Main Street.

Improved transportation modes were reducing travel time between the New York City area and the Catskills. Tourism increased as a result. The area, already made famous by artists, authors, and poets would begin to see a seasonal boom to supplement its agricultural base. Many hotels and boarding or “rooming houses” were either established or expanded.

This pattern continued until the early 20th century, which marked the gradual decline of horse-drawn transportation and its replacement, by the automobile. The “horseless carriage” would forever change the way Americans lived and tourist destinations like Cairo would benefit from this newfound mobility. But this proved fatal to the local railroad industry, and the Cairo Railroad would close after the 1918 summer season. Iron from the railway was used for the efforts of America’s First World War. Visitors now arrived in individual autos, spawning the growth of filling stations and roadside souvenir stands.

The summer months continued to draw the crowds to the long-established Cairo Fair. Farmers, still active in their agricultural pursuits, were finding the additional income from providing boarding space very beneficial, and eventually some gave up farming altogether and expanded into full-fledged resorts, such as Glenbrook Farm in the hamlet of Round Top.

When the Second World War finally concluded, returning soldiers found a robust and growing home front. Larger families led to creation of expanded services and improved tax base. Even the scattered rural hamlets of Cairo remained active, enjoying the economic benefits of a population that would often double in the summer months.

Many new boarding houses were built during this expansion by now well-established Italian and German families. A strong Chamber of Commerce developed. The town supported two all-night diners, a movie theater, department store, and other specialized outlet. Even proprietors of duplicate services shared and prospered in this market.

The early 1950’s saw the establishment of a small strip mall on the outskirts of the village. A few years later a divided state highway project was completed, paralleling the original State Route 23 (now renamed 23B). Some cheered the removal of sometimes heavy truck traffic through the village. Others declared it the death knell of the community’s business. Hindsight now tells us that outside forces, such

History of Cairo

Robert Uzzilia – Historian

For centuries nomadic native Americans occupied the central wilderness of Greene County. The Iroquois, Esopus and other tribes fished the streams and hunted for game to sustain themselves. By the mid 1700's, however, land titles were obtained by European settlers and Colonial Districts established.

Although most early settlement was scattered, consisting of single log homes, one settler of distinction came here in 1765 and settled a large tract of land along the Catskill Creek. James Barker and his wife, Elizabeth Wooer, brought 23 tenant farm families here from London, England. He would name the 6,000 acre settlement "Woodstock" after the English Manor house in which he was born. Despite the physical hardships and the death of his infant son to illness, the Barkers and the settlement prospered. Families were raised and their influence spread throughout the surrounding area.

After the American Revolution, many New England families moved West to purchase affordable farmland. Now safe from both British forces and occasional attacks by aggressive Indians, the new settlers started critical businesses for a growing settlement and their numbers increased many folds. An Iron Forge was established along the Shingle Kill in Purling in 1788, utilizing charcoal iron shipped from Ancram in Columbia County to form useful implements for local farmers. It is said that the Shingle Kill was named for its abundant supply of adjacent woodland, providing the raw materials for the manufacture of the essential roofing material.

The construction of the Susquehannah Turnpike in 1801 created a conduit of travel for people and goods through the area. This influenced the formation of what is now Cairo Village into a destination point, with early inns, blacksmiths and other needed services.

Early industries, which found success in the growing town, included tanning of hides, utilizing the tannic acid from the then abundant Hemlock. Ira Day and Daniel Sayre each established early tanneries, but both succumbed to the over-harvesting of their main resource. Other small but essential businesses included many sawmills, Montgomery Stevens distillery and Judge Moses Austin's wool factory.

1838 to 1840, Cairo's fate had been sealed by its mechanical limitations as well as competition from Albany interests and the subsequent lack of financial support.
